Sunday, March 12, 2016 Newfoundland and Labrador has formed a new coalition of First Nations that will pursue talks on remaining land claims with Ottawa, CBC News has learned. The new coalition includes Carrothers First Nation, Waskaganish First Nation, Little Whale River First Nation and St. Brendan's. They say the negotiations will focus on establishing a framework for future discussions and will work closely with the Department of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development. The coalition calls itself the Tri-Community Regional Land Claims Steering Committee. Former minister of Aboriginal Affairs Ed Whitaker says the coalition is key in addressing long-standing land claims in the province. "This is the kind of process that gives aboriginal communities the best chance to resolve their land claims and to get on with their lives in the long term," Whitaker said. "This is really a key step forward in the process of land claim negotiations." The latest addition to the coalition is the Middle Island Mi'kmaq First Nation. Middle Island, according to a release from the coalition, has a traditional relationship with the Mi'kmaq people, but is not a member of the Mi'kmaq Nation. There are 4,600 members of Carrothers First Nation, about 1,200 members of Waskaganish First Nation and about 1,500 members of Little Whale River First Nation. St. Brendan's, meanwhile, is believed to be the first Aboriginal Community Services Society of Canada, known as ASCS, to join the coalition. ASCS, the coalition says, was first established to represent families who had been cut off from other families due to acts of violence. Kijung Wakas, the president of Carrothers First Nation, says he hopes to get a land claim settlement, but not too much of one. "We believe there's enough land in the province to provide for everybody's needs," Wakas said. "My concern is that there's a lot of people that's the way they've been living for the past 500 years, and we want to give them the right to control their future."
