The effect of the first-course technique on the following-course fatigue resistance of bonded enamel-dentin. This in vitro study examined the effect of the first-course technique on the bond strength and the following-course fatigue resistance of dentin-bonded porcelain. Dentin and ceramic were bonded with a self-etching priming system and a multi-step bonding system. The dentin-bonded specimens were divided into five groups: (1) with no porcelain; (2) with the first-course technique; (3) with the first-course technique and the multi-step bonding system; (4) with the first-course technique and the same bonding system as that of group (3); and (5) with the first-course technique, the same bonding system as that of group (3) and a 1.5-mm-thick porcelain layer. Shear bond strength testing was performed after thermocycling (5 degrees C-55 degrees C, 6000 cycles). After fracturing, the fractured surfaces were examined with SEM. The results were analyzed using the Kruskal-Wallis and Mann-Whitney tests at a significance level of 5%. Porcelain was significantly more likely to fracture at the first-course technique than at the second-course technique. For the following-course fatigue resistance, the first-course technique significantly reduced the fracture rate. The fracture rate for dentin-bonded specimens with the first-course technique and the multi-step bonding system was lower than that for specimens with the first-course technique and the same bonding system as that of group (3). The first-course technique for enamel bonding is a promising procedure, but the choice of the bonding system for dentin-bonded restorations should be considered. Ever wondered how some people can see a person's face? Why do people like some people who are far away? How do you have an idea of à€ˆà€ˆsomeone by their sound? We all have a very strong ability to see what is close to our mind, and to hear what is very far away, we can see and hear everything. What are your friends saying? What are your friends thinking? What are they trying to say? How can you hear what they are saying? All this is very simple. fffad4f19a
