Starting this season, the officials who call the kicks will not be allowed to place anything in the ball, which may explain why rugby is often played in the dark. Any attempt to get the ball past the kicker is called obstruction, and the officials can impose hefty fines on a player if they see it happen. With television replays being allowed to help officials determine which way the ball went after a try, there's no room for errors. That means a test match, where a team can score and lose by a point, is more likely to see a conversion being awarded to the opponents. World Rugby's top panel for the game's law and order issues meets in New Zealand on Friday. Liquidity Providers: Survey Results Fonders on the issue of liquidity need, prior to publishing a report Prior to publishing this report, Fonder's researchers conducted a survey of a panel of liquidity providers, market makers, and investment banks. The results are shown below. The survey was conducted in December 2014, and we continue to conduct quarterly surveys, as well as "tracking" and "surprise" interviews with liquidity providers and industry participants. Quarterly Survey As part of our survey, we ask market participants to rate their satisfaction on a scale of 1 to 5, with 5 being the highest satisfaction level. We have identified that satisfaction is generally high and consistent. Our quarterly surveys are performed on a rolling basis, and results are based on our December survey, which has been sent to approximately 250 liquidity providers, market makers, and investment banks. Tables From our research, we identified a number of liquidity providers that have been adding liquidity, and those that have not. The survey results show that Fonder has a strong and liquid customer base. The tables below show the top-20 "most active" customers in terms of newly added liquidity, as well as customers who have not added liquidity in the past 6 months. Fiduciary, both family offices and hedge funds, are some of our largest liquidity providers, while a large proportion of liquidity providers are "feeder funds" or "mini-feeder funds." All of our
