It is known to provide a light to electrically illuminate a fume hood which encloses an area in which toxic vapors may be present. In some systems, a light is provided which is in constant "on" mode. That is, the light is continuously lit or is continuously illuminated at full brightness. In other systems, a light is provided which is flashed on and off in a cyclic manner. In the above-mentioned systems, a sensor is provided to sense whether the fume hood is in the fully open position and to "turn off" the light when the hood is fully open. This latter type of system is often referred to as an electrically-operated hood. Typically, when the fume hood is not in the open position, the hood light is "off". When the fume hood is in the open position, the hood light is "on". The reason that the hood light is "on" when the fume hood is in the open position is to protect an operator from any harm 2d92ce491b
